They work fine. There are a few things I do differently. I do not use sp_recovery. I check the report file location on startup and copy the old report to the same location, then run the Report Viewer. I delete the old report from the DB and run the report. The dash boards use a unique name that I generate. When the dash boards are run, I have the user select the unique dash board name, then I make a copy of the dash board before it is run. I have no issues with what you have described. Q: Rails Subscriptions has_many through extra column I have an users table and subscriptions table. Users can make comments, and each comment will have a reply_id field. Each comment also has a reply relationship to its related subscription.
