Leucine-rich repeats (LRRs) are widespread among eukaryotes and contain multiple copies of a 35 amino acid motif. These repetitive motifs are grouped in families of genes, which in many cases are interspersed with more variable and diverse coding sequences in protein-coding genes. With the availability of genome sequences, it has become possible to identify the coding sequences of all LRR genes in several species of Drosophila, plants and mammals. Here we report the identification and characterization of 25 LRR genes from Arabidopsis thaliana. All the LRR genes in Arabidopsis fall into ten families and contain four to fifteen LRR motifs. LRR genes in Arabidopsis show a broad expression pattern during all stages of development and most genes are expressed exclusively in floral organs. Nine of the 25 Arabidopsis LRR genes are clustered in three regions on chromosome 2. The remaining LRR genes are dispersed throughout the genome. Comparison of the primary structure of Arabidopsis LRR genes with those of other species shows a distinct repeat motif for each of the ten LRR gene families. Pleasanton Weekly The weather is getting colder, the holidays are upon us, and chances are your mailbox is more likely to be full of spam than your bank account. But that doesn't mean you can't count on timely deliveries from your local representatives in Pleasanton -- or the local Postal Service for that matter. But the honest truth is that the Postal Service is facing monumental challenges. More than ever, the delivery service is seeing low volumes in the post office -- and that means it's been forced to cut staff and services to save money. The postal service has been warning f678ea9f9e
